RESEARCH

My research is guided by the fields of community, natural resource, and environmental sociology, and seeks to understand, from a sociological perspective, local processes that minimize the negative effects of rapid community change while enhancing sustainable livelihoods. My work, conducted through quantitative, qualitative, and mixed research methods domestically and internationally, occurs within the contexts of amenity migration, tourism, protected areas, natural events, and community health.

TEACHING

My teaching philosophy is based on providing students with knowledge and skills that will be useful in their future as professionals. With undergraduate students, I develop that knowledge and skills based on recommendations provided to me by external advisory boards that define what students should be able to do when graduated. Additionally, all of my courses contain high impact learning components, allowing students to put into perspective the knowledge and skills learned in class. With my graduate students, I teach them to develop skills needed in their academic careers by encouraging and guiding them to find funding to support their studies and research, encouraging and helping them to engage in teaching, and collaborating with them in the process of publishing.
